Guiding Principles for Child Welfare

Principle #1: Child welfare policies and services must reflect an understanding and appreciation of factors that positively or negatively affect child development and family systems. Abuse of alcohol and other drugs affects child development and family systems. Thus, child welfare policies and programs must:

- Respond to the unique needs of children affected by prenatal alcohol or drug exposure or by a host of other detrimental experiences related to their parents’ chemical involvement or dependency; and
- Respond to the needs of all children entering the system who are themselves chemically involved or at-risk of alcohol or drug problems and prevent children already in the system from becoming chemically involved.

Principle #2: Research and empirical data must guide child welfare policies and services related to serving all children and families. Research suggests that chemical involvement affects differently individual children and families.

- Therefore, child welfare professionals must recognize that chemically involved children and families are not alike. Child welfare professionals must tailor the process of assessment, planning, and service delivery to match individual needs with appropriate resources.

Principle #3: P.L. 105-89, the Adoption and Safe Families Act (ASFA), mandates that child safety, well-being, and permanency achieved in a timely manner serve as the cornerstone of our work with children and families. ASFA establishes timelines under which those serving children must achieve permanency for children whether that be through reunification, adoption, or some other court-approved permanent living arrangement.

- Therefore, parental chemical dependency does not alter the requirements of state and federal laws. Individuals must address, within existing legal frameworks, recommendations for improved services to chemically involved children and families.

Principle #4: Families are important to the development of children. All children need a sense of belonging. The biological family, within a community that supports a positive cultural and ethnic identity, usually best promotes this sense of belonging. This principle is no less true in the case of children of chemically dependent families.

- Therefore, in planning for the child, child welfare professionals must consider the complex needs of the chemically dependent family. Family involvement is essential. Child welfare professionals must support family involvement, beginning with the delivery of preventive services, through treatment and intervention, permanency planning, and final implementation of the permanency plan.

Principle #5: All parents coming to the attention of the child welfare system must receive services and supports to prevent their unnecessary separation from their children. When necessary, parents must also receive services that support ongoing safe and healthy relationships with their children and facilitate family reunification.

- Therefore, efforts to support children within their chemically dependent families must attempt to address chemical dependency in the family while meeting the developmental and safety needs of the children. Specific services and activities to strengthen and support families will vary with the individual circumstances of the child and family.

Principle #6: Many families have multiple problems that require coordinated services and effective case management.

- Therefore, child welfare services for chemically involved families should be comprehensive, community-based, culturally/ethnically competent, and coordinated through an active case manager who provides linkage with a range of alcohol and drug prevention, treatment, and aftercare services.

Principle #7: Effective delivery of services to all children and families is dependent on a well-trained and well-compensated workforce and adequate funding to support an array of services and cross-system approaches.

- Therefore, quality services for children and families who are chemically involved must be delivered by staff, caregivers, and/or volunteers who are: representative of the clients served, trained in alcohol and other drug issues as they affect families, able to deliver culturally-competent services, and professionally supported to manage their assigned cases.

Principle #8: Child welfare professionals must base child welfare services on a respect for and sensitivity to the racial, cultural, and ethnic diversity represented in our society. Furthermore, child welfare agencies must identify and help to remedy economic conditions that place the well-being of children and families at risk.

- Therefore, child welfare agencies must examine and address racial, cultural, and economic barriers in their policies and/or practices that have a negative impact on people of color or low-income families. Child Welfare Professionals must be aware of racial, cultural, and ethnic strengths and traditions upon which they might draw as resources to promote recovery and prevent relapse.
